When this article was originally published in African Studies Review it contained a missed edit in the line:

Our observations and reading reveal that the policy debates surrounding land reform and natural resource conservation in Uganda, as well as reading of the policy/development sector and academic literatures on East African customary land, reveal these to be largely detached.

This sentence should read as follows:

Our observations and reading reveal that the policy debates surrounding land reform and natural resource conservation in Uganda, and the policy/development sector and academic literatures on East African customary land, are largely detached from our lived reality as customary landholders, and the empirical reality as we have observed it over our lifespans.

The publisher apologises for this error.
