Contributors

Mark Aldrich is Marilyn Carlson Nelson Professor of Economics at Smith College, where he teaches courses in economic history and the history of technology. He is the author of Safety First: Technology, Labor, and Business in the Building of American Work Safety, 1870–1939 (1997), as well as numerous articles on the history of work safety. He is currently writing a book on the history of railroad safety in America.

William J. Breen is a reader in history at La Trobe University, Melbourne. He received his undergraduate degree from the University of Melbourne and his Ph.D. from Duke University. His publications deal with themes relating to home-front mobilization in the United States during both world wars. Currently he is completing a manuscript on the role of the War Manpower Commission in World War II, which will form a companion volume to his study of the World War I labor market, Labor Market Politics and the Great War: The Department of Labor, the States, and the First U.S. Employment Service, 1907–1933 (1997). His research interests, reflected in the present study, are the incorporation of the social sciences into the state during World War II, particularly the part played by the Bureau of the Budget in that process.

Anatole Browde is adjunct professor at the John E. Simon School of Business of Maryville University in St. Louis. He received his doctorate in history from Washington University. Prior to his academic work he was an executive at McDonnell Douglas, where he published technical papers in the fields of electronics, space systems, and aircraft collision avoidance. He is currently studying the economic history of the British Empire and the settlement of Canada.
