A Cautionary Tale

Once upon a time there was no Royal College of Psychiatrists.

This was a bad thing.

There were a lot of consultant psychiatrists who had much experience but little knowledge.

This was not a good thing and the clients, perceiving that they were not good, did without help.

Soon things got better.

There were a lot of better consultant psychiatrists with a lot of knowledge who cared about clients and helped them.

Then one day they began to say
'We must improve psychiatric training so that all future consultants are good.'

So they set up a committee of people with a

Soon there were a lot of trainees having so much training that they got little experience but much knowledge, and did not learn to care about clients.

And the good consultants, perceiving that they would get no help from their juniors, went away and worked themselves to death.

Then there were a lot of new consultants with much knowledge but no experience and their patients, perceiving that they were no help turned to other therapists instead.
