
About the Authors

David Abraham is Associate Professor of Law at the University of Miami School of Law. He has published extensively on German political economy and history, including The Collapse of the Weimar Republic: Political Economy and Crisis (1981, 1986). His current research interests include labor law and industrial relations, social and legal transformations in Europe, issues of citizenship and rights, the juridification of social relations in the welfare state, and the future of democratic socialism.

David H. Bayley is a Professor in the School of Criminal Law at the State University of New York at Albany. A specialist in international criminal justice and policing, he has done extensive research on the police in India, Japan, Australia, Canada, United Kingdom, Singapore, and the United States. He has just completed a multiyear research project on the future of policing in five countries, to be published as Police for the Future (Princeton University Press).

Erhard Blankenburg has been teaching sociology of law and criminology at the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam since 1980. After teaching sociology and sociology of law at Freiburg University 1965–70, he served as consultant with the Quickborn Team Hamburg until 1972, as senior research fellow at the Prognos AG Basel until 1974, at the Max Planck-Institut Freiburg 1974–75 and at the Science Centre Berlin until 1980. His publications include books on police, public prosecutors, civil courts, labor courts, legal aid, and sociology of law in general.

James Bohman is Associate Professor of Philosophy at Saint Louis University. He is author of New Philosophy of Social Science: Problems of Indeterminacy (MIT Press, 1991) and co-editor of After Philosophy (MIT Press, 1987) and The Interpretive Turn (Cornell University Press, 1991). He has also written articles on democratic theory, on interpretation and explanation in the social sciences, and on problems of social criticism. He is currently finishing a book on deliberative democracy, Public Deliberation: Democracy, Pluralism and Complexity (MIT Press, forthcoming 1995).

John Braithwaite is a Professor in the Research School of Social Sciences, Australian National University. He coordinates a project to celebrate the centenary of the Australian Constitution: Reshaping Australian Institutions: Towards and Beyond 2001. This involves more than a hundred scholars researching and writing about the institutions of a nation. His most recent books include Corporations, Crime and Accountability (with Brent Fisse) and Responsive Regulation (with Ian Ayres).

Kenneth Casebeer is Professor of Law and Scholar in Residence at the University of Miami School of Law. He is engaged with a growing number of others in creating the new subfield of Labor Law History. He is currently working on a book that combines social history and social theory, using recent labor struggles as a lens to look at the relation between the deployment of dominant power and participatory democracy in community, in order to bring social contest over the terms and conditions of social life into a reinterpretation of the substantive meaning of law. He still believes there is a necessary connection between modes of production and the organization of social life.

Mark Cooney is Assistant Professor of Sociology and Adjunct Assistant Professor of Law at the University of Georgia. His two primary research interests are the sociology of legal fact-finding and the social conditions under which homicide occurs in human societies.

Kathleen Daly is a Visiting Associate Professor of Sociology at the University of Michigan. She has written on how gender and race structure patterns of crime and justice system responses, formal and informal responses to violence against women, and the relationship of feminist theory to criminology, law, and justice. Her book Gender, Crime, and Punishment (Yale University Press, 1994) analyzes men's and women's pathways to felony court, the social organization of their lawbreaking, and the theories of punishment judges use in justifying their sentences.

Karyl A. Kinsey is a social psychologist and Research Fellow at the American Bar Foundation. Her research interests include social class differences in the cognitive processing of fairness evaluations and the effects of substantive tax law on perceived fairness, tax avoidance, and noncompliance with the law.

Toska Olson is a predoctoral candidate in the Department of Sociology at the University of Washington. Her research and teaching specialties include gender differentiation and stratification.

Jana Pershing is a predoctoral candidate in the Sociology Department at the University of Washington. Her research interests include deviance and social control and gender differentiation.

Philip Pettit is Professor of Social and Political Theory at the Research School of Social Sciences, Australian National University. Apart from his book with John Braithwaite on Not Just Deserts: A Republican Theory of Criminal Justice (Oxford University Press, 1990), he is author of The Common Mind: An Essay on Psychology, Society and Politics (Oxford University Press, 1993). He is currently at work on a new book, A Civil Republic: The Sociopolitics of Non-domination.

Stuart A. Scheingold is a Professor in the Department of Political Science at the University of Washington. His published books include The Politics of Rights, The Politics of Law and Order, and The Politics of Street Crime.

Jonathan Simon is Associate Professor of Law at the University of Miami. His book, Poor Discipline: Parole and the Social Control of the Underclass, 1890–1990 (University of Chicago Press, 1993), was the co-winner of the 1994 Distinguished Book Award given by the Sociology of Law section of the American Sociological Association. He is currently studying the emergence of risk as a pervasive framework of evaluation in contemporary society.

Loretta Stalans is an Assistant Professor of Criminal Justice at Loyola University at Chicago. Her research focuses on how citizens and authorities make decisions involving legal and social issues. She has published several articles on community sentiment about statutory laws and laypersons' expectations about legal arenas. She is currently examining how police officers and laypersons arrive at decisions on how to handle domestic violence situations and how taxpayers' expectations shape the nature and evaluation of their tax audits.

Tom R. Tyler is Professor of Psychology at the University of California, Berkeley. He is the author of two recent books, The Social Psychology of Procedural Justice (with E. Allan Lind, 1988) and Why People Obey the Law (1990).

Frank K. Upham is Professor of Law at New York University School of Law.