

However, the Parc National des Volcans comprises less than a third of the gorillas' total range in the Virunga Volcanoes, and the animals cannot survive there unless they are also adequately protected in the other two countries involved, Uganda and Zaïre. The next step, therefore, must be to strengthen the protection in these two countries, perhaps by a similar injection of funds and expertise, and, very importantly, to encourage implementation of recommendations already drawn up during tripartite meetings on co-operation in the whole Virunga conservation area. At the moment the countries act independently of each other; they need to work together.
