

columns

the columns

correspondence

Vulnerable patients, vulnerable doctors (CR101)

As a Continuing Medical Education (CME) Group of Consultants in the Psychiatry of Learning Disabilities, we wish to express our deep concern at the vignette (case 3) contained in the recent publication 'Vulnerable patients, vulnerable doctors' (CR101).

We welcome the educational objectives of this document and the opportunity to address the complexities of working in this sub-speciality with large numbers of vulnerable people. However, we feel that the serious and important ethical issues raised in this vignette are undermined by the portrayal of the consultant psychiatrist in learning disability, and this potentially damages our standing in the medical profession.

J. O'Hara CME Group Coordinator, the North East London/East Anglia CME Group: Emmanuel Akuffo Consultant Psychiatrist, Waltham Forest, Susil Attale Consultant Psychiatrist, Brentwood, Anton Canagasaby Consultant Psychiatrist, Billericay, C. Chandra-Rajan Consultant Psychiatrist, Southend, Deirdre O'Brady Consultant Psychiatrist, Newham, Jean O'Hara Consultant Psychiatrist, Tower Hamlets, Tom Picton Specialist Registrar, Psychiatry of Learning Disabilities, Colchester, Rahman Consultant Psychiatrist, Billericay, David Thomas Consultant Psychiatrist, Redbridge, Emad Yousif Consultant Psychiatrist, Colchester

Reply from the President

I am grateful for Dr O'Hara's letter about the vignette in the College publication 'Vulnerable patients, vulnerable doctors' (CR101). I feel that I should reply to her, and through her to the North East London/East Anglia CME Group, as one of the authors of that publication.

The publication was 'commissioned' by the General Medical Council (GMC) after a series of high-profile cases involving psychiatrists. The College felt (under its then President, the late Dr Robert Kendell) that the GMC had 'let us down' in one particular case by not taking action against someone who had so crossed the boundaries of the doctor-patient relationship that it was beyond all acceptability. Much to our surprise, we were told that the GMC had no 'vade-mecum' to take off the shelf to judge psychiatric/therapeutic relationships against, even in what we would see as quite flagrant breaches of ethics. Slightly against our wishes, we agreed to write it for them.

In the event, it was a very worthwhile exercise, involving an initial working party of representatives from all Faculties and Sections of the College, important special interest groups (inside and outside the College) and lay bodies. This work was then distilled by the four main authors into a publication that again went through the College Committee structure until it was refined into the final Council Report (CR101). This was felt to be so important to practice that it was produced as one of the key 'Good Psychiatric Practice' series. It has received acclamation both within the College and outside; the GMC will use it as a template for many medical relationships, not just those in psychiatry.

Having said all that, the road to publication was not totally smooth. There were no vignettes in the original version, vignettes were later interspersed through the text, and we were finally persuaded to gather them together at the end to illustrate training points based on the main points within the text. All of the vignettes were controversial, but they were about controversial issues dealt with regularly by the GMC. None of them, I regret to say, was wholly fictional.

The vignette you talk about in your letter was discussed a great deal and was finally agreed for inclusion on the grounds that, if such appalling practice does come before the GMC, we had better tell them how totally unacceptable it is. There was no reflection cast on learning disability psychiatrists as a whole, any more than the other vignettes criticised the subspeciality involved in each one.

I hope that goes some way towards clarifying the process behind the publication at least. I only hope we might reach the day when it will be made unnecessary because such breaches of ethics do not occur. However, given the pressures that doctors work under, I doubt that will ever happen. This is why we were keen to talk about vulnerable patients and doctors all the way through.

Mike Shooter President, Royal College of Psychiatrists

Sir James Crichton-Browne

I am most grateful to Dr Thomas Walmsley for keeping alive the memory of Sir James Crichton-Browne (Psychiatric Bulletin, January 2003, 27, 20–22), one of the very few really outstanding Victorian asylum alienists.

Crichton-Browne was the Medical Superintendent of the West Riding Asylum, Wakefield, Yorkshire, for the decade 1866–76. He was the first of a succession of talented administrators cum research workers, mainly concerned with brain pathology and histology, who collectively constituted the Golden Age of British psychiatry during the second half of the 19th Century. He himself, as Dr Walmsley reports, founded and edited the West Riding Medical Reports, six volumes of which he published between 1871–76, and which were far more prestigious than the dull Journal of Mental Science, the official journal of the Medico-Psychological Association.

But his crowning achievement was to decriminalise the evil reputation surrounding the asylum – any asylum. This he did, metaphorically, by tearing down its prison-like walls and opening up its abundant clinical and laboratory facilities. For example, he instigated regular 'Medical Conversazioni' at the asylum, all of them well attended, and addressed by leading contemporary neurologists and alienists alike. Another innovation, which puts him decades ahead of his time, was to invite senior medical students from Leeds Medical School for demonstration and tutorials which, more often than not, he conducted himself.

It is no exaggeration to claim that due to his dynamic energy and foresight, the centre of gravity of British psychiatry during his time was shifted from London to Yorkshire, with emphasis on the triad of Leeds, Wakefield and York.

Sir James Crichton-Browne may well have been somewhat immodest, but, taking into account his mountainous contribution, he had a helluva lot to be immodest about.

Henry R. Rollin 101 College Road, Epsom, Surrey KT17 4HY